

UNAUTHORIZED ASSISTANCE EX 1

A student is cramming for an Astronomy exam they have in the afternoon. A friend of took the exam in an earlier section this morning. The student sends a text to their friend asking for details about the exam. However, the student's friend never answers, and they take the exam that afternoon.

Is this against the University's academic honesty policy?

Does cheating occur when you attempt it or when it has occurred successfully?

Are those who enable cheating just as responsible? Why or why not?

If yes, should they be punished or punished the same way as the student that violated the Academic honesty policy?

If the student is a history major, does cheating in a non-major related class matter?

UNAUTHORIZED ASSISTANCE EX 2

A student is having a very busy midterm week and hasn't had time to finish his FREN 2002 essay. To save time, he writes the essay in English and puts it into Google Translate. The course's policy says no translation services are allowed, so he edits Google Translate's phrases to represent the level that he is currently studying.

Did the student understand the professor's policy about outside resources?

How else should the student have handled this situation?

Would it be different if the student used the site for a few words instead of the entire essay?

Is this against the academic honesty policy?

When is using translator sites like Google Translate allowed?

